London Northwestern Railway passengers offered chance to go ‘behind the scenes’ in latest company podcast

A rare behind-the-scenes look at London Northwestern Railway (LNR) and exclusive insights from the company’s senior management are among the highlights in the latest edition of the operator’s popular “On the Rails” podcast.

LNR, in partnership with sister operator West Midlands Railway, carries more than five million customers every month and passengers can now tune in to a special podcast episode recorded at the company’s annual conference.

This year's event was hosted by Vicki Pipe, co-creator of the All the Stations project. In the episode, Vicki leads a live panel Q&A session with four of the company's department leads, covering drivers, conductors, stations and performance.

Answering a mix of questions, the four senior team members discuss a range of topics from AI and gender diversity to travel disruption and training programmes.

Listeners are invited to experience what it's like to attend the conference and network with attendees, hearing from representatives of the Community Rail Network, the Mental Wealth Company and LNR's own graduate scheme.

Jonny Wiseman, LNR customer experience director, said: "Our 'On the Rails' podcast gives customers an insight into the inner workings of the rail industry.

"This episode brings a behind-the-scenes look at our yearly conference, with the chance to hear our department leads answer questions put to them live.

"I'm sure some of the questions asked will be on the mind of our customers too, so sharing it publicly was something we were really excited to do."
