London Northwestern Railway seeks next cohort of trainee drivers

London Northwestern Railway (LNR) has launched a recruitment drive for its next cohort of trainee drivers, with over 40 places open for candidates aged 20 and above.

These opportunities come at an exciting time for the business, as railway passenger numbers continue to grow. LNR has invested £1billion into introducing new trains and improving infrastructure on its network, and with timetable enhancements set to come soon, these roles offer the chance to be part of this expansion.

A minimum of 12 months of training will be provided for all successful candidates, including classroom and practical-based teaching, so no railway experience is required.

As well as learning how to drive LNR's trains, apprentices will learn how to prepare different units for service and key customer service skills.

Opportunities are available in Coventry and Bletchley, with new recruits carrying out their paid classroom-based training at LNR's academy in Birmingham.

However, aspiring drivers will need to act quickly, as the job openings close on Friday 24 October.

Richard Morrow, LNR head of drivers, said: "Becoming a trainee driver opens up a fantastic lifelong career in the rail industry, and we are encouraging people from all walks of life to apply. Whether you are looking for that first step on the job ladder, a parent returning to work or simply want a change in career, if you are passionate, committed and focused, this role could be for you."

Darren Hutchison, LNR driver manager, said: "I started my railway career as a trainee driver in 2014. Once I qualified, I moved to LNR where I've been for nine years. During this time, I progressed to Driving Instructor and now proudly work as a Driver Manager.

"What I've appreciated most is the opportunity to grow. Every week brings rewarding experiences, from mentoring drivers as they develop to supporting passengers who need a hand. Making a difference, big or small, is the most rewarding part of my role."
